A few years ago he was also renowned as a player of i allone, a game resembling rackets, though on a grander reale, and requiring great strength of arm and general audity; and I believe he still makes an occasional appearance in the Pallone court.

Salvini has a ways been noted as an athlete, and o ce in his youth, while acting the part of Nero, he exerted so much vigor in a contest with the virtuous gladiator of the piece that the supposed conoceror was carried off with a dislocated shoulder. This "Nero," by the way, was not Cossa's well-known tragedy, but an inferior production of an auterior date by Costettiand Gnaltiero, long barried in well-deserved oblivion.

On another occasion, too, Salvini's muscular energy had an alarming result. He was acting his famous part of Orosmane in voltaires. Zaire at Bologna, and recognizing among the andience the isce of his oid friend, the veteran actor Langi Monti, was insplied to do his very best. Suddenly, in the great scene of the play, he was started by a warning crack. The most indispensable part of his attre had given away at the waist and was slowly descending.

What was to be done? One moment of agony, and then, casting Zaire from him, he swatch, as it were mechanically, at a skin he started, as it were mechanically, at a skin he started, as it were mechanically, at a skin he started, as it were mechanically, at a skin he started, as it were mechanically, at a skin here.

What was to be done? One moment of agony, and then, casting Zaire from him, he suatched, as it were mechanically, at a skin spread over her couch, and folding it about him with a superb gesture, sat down and concluded the act without change of posture. This novel effect brought down the house, for not a single spectator, save Luigi-Monti, perhaps, had discerned his terrible pre-licament.

borne to us clear and resonant in a mighty wave of sound and had the effect of an organ peal after much tooting of penny whistles. Mind the Big Storm a Bit. During the recent heavy rains a flock of sparrows enjoyed great sport at the western end of the Rattery sea-wall. There is a dight of white stone steps there leading down to the water, and there one morning down to the water, and there one morning while the rain was falling in barrels and the waters of the bay were rolling in in huge billows, these sparrows amused themselves. They fluttered down the steps, dipped their heads in the water, and when an extra large wave threatened to drown them they lightly took wing and rose above it.

Despite the rain a number of people stood and watefied them until, wearled of their sport, they flew away.
